Cough, Mosquito and Back Seat Driver All Offenders

NEW YORK, Sept. 8 — What are the chief annoyances a human being has to face, and how do they vary in stinging powers?

These questions are answered in an extensive study of the origin and nature of common annoyances that has been made by Hulsey Cason, Professor of Psychology at the University of Rochester, in collaboration with his wife, Eloise Boeker Cason.

First, people are mainly annoyed by the behavior of other people.

Second, people are annoyed by non-human things and activities, exclusive of clothes.

Third, people are annoyed by matters concerned with clothes and manners of dress.

Fourth, people are annoyed by alterable physical characteristics of other people.

Fifth, people are annoyed by persisting physical characteristics of other people.

Here are some of the outstanding sources of annoyance listed in the study.

The figure at the end of each item is the average score the item received when the list was submitted to representative groups of more than 200 people. An indication of the comparative score may be gathered from the fact that the highest score was 28.9; the lowest 0.8.
